Can the conservative approach to endodontics save a tooth? This study analyzed the changing patterns of endodontic treatment at a single large-volume oral surgery practice over a nine year period. Of 476 consecutive root canal treatments performed during the study period: only 0.2% were restorative, 0.9% were feldspathic porcelain, 0.1% were custom porcelain, 0.4% were prefabricated gold, and 5.6% were digital (a porcelain fused to a titanium post). The techniques and materials used were similar to those reported by previous authors. Of the 476 treatments, 3.4% were found to be failures after initial therapy. In these cases, the success of conservative endodontic treatment was questionable in terms of tooth survival and patient satisfaction. The success of the conservative approach was significantly (P less than.05) better than the success rate of teeth treated with the other endodontic treatment approaches. Compared to patients having endodontic treatment for the first time, patients with previous endodontic treatment had significantly (P less than.001) better success rates with the same treatment approaches. In conclusion, conservative endodontic treatment is an effective and reasonable approach for the care of the grossly decayed endodontically treated tooth.
