

Queuing is equivalent to virtualization. The extent to which different operating systems support the same Linux API for virtualization suggests that this is the case. In Windows, you can use the concept of logical drives to build a virtual disk in Windows. Microsoft can use the same approach for its Windows-based virtualization products. VMware may be able to use this approach, but for some reason, it does not work in the VMware Fusion for Windows 7 under Windows Vista. We cannot think of any technical reason why this might not work in Windows 7. VMware vCenter in Windows 7 also does not allow a disk to be mounted from a guest virtual machine to the host operating system. However, Windows 7 does allow the virtualization of the guest operating system using Windows Server 2008 Hyper-V. The Windows Server 2008 Hyper-V host operating system allows you to use shared storage and shared network adapters in your virtual machines, which you could not use in a virtual machine on Windows 7. If you have an operating system virtualization product on Windows 7, you can probably use it with Hyper-V.
